THE WOMEN'S CODE

Balance Training Facilitator Training

Public speaking becomes easy when you believe in the message and you simply share ideas that resonate with you.

The most effective way to facilitate a great live presentation is to identify the different topics YOU find most interesting to discuss with your group. You are going to lead the discussion, so it is important you are comfortable with the topics.

Here is the format that I suggest and personally use for live presentations:

authorit experie relate to	y introducing yourself: Who you are, why this book matters, and why you are y to speak on this subject. Think about how you relate the book, such as similar nees in your life or experiences that you know some of your group members can b, and how the book has helped you solve a problem. Also explain the training and timeframes. Your introduction should last 5-10 minutes
agenda

Balance Training Facilitator Training

Topic 2: Three	main points of	this idea (10 n	n in). Afterward (group discussion	(10 n
Topic 3: Three	main points of	this idea (10 n	n in). Afterward (group discussion	(10 n
Topic 3: Three	main points of	this idea (10 n	nin). Afterward (group discussion	(10 r
Topic 3: Three	main points of	this idea (10 n	nin). Afterward (group discussion	(10 r

Balance Training Facilitator Training

Here are some of the topic ideas that resonate with the Women's Code team (which consists entirely of women from all over the world) AND our readers.

1. ego-RHYTHM®

• This is the big idea that powers The Women's Code, and it is the favorite concept that every woman who has been through the course raves about. Do you know which one you are? How did you find out?

2. The Women's Code core message

• Describe what the core message is for you. Some responses we've had range from finding happiness at work, to ending bullying, building better relationships, passing fewer judgments, and improving collaboration.

3. Support

 Are you getting the support you need at home and at work? After you read the chapter on Support, how did you apply the concepts to get more support?

4. Communication

 Discuss ideas for improving your communication and examining the effectiveness of your conversations at home.

5. The Triple Paradox

Which paradox are you facing? Which ones can you relate to? What can you do to have a more realistic image of yourself? Where do you beat yourself up? What is the biggest misconception other women have of you?

6. Self-image

Do you have a realistic image of yourself? How can you be gentler with yourself?

7. Feminism

 Is the term "feminist" relevant to you? What does feminism mean to you? What does a modern feminist look like?

8. Role Models

- Who are your role models? How can we become positive examples for others?
- 9. How can you implement the Code to benefit our community?
- 10. Does the Core Code of Conduct feel familiar? How can you apply it more in your personal or professional life?
- 11. How can you apply the Three Pillars: Awareness, Support, and Collaboration, to solve a current problem at work, at home, or with another woman?

Balance Training Facilitator Training

Here is another one of my favorite tips. Personal stories are always easiest to remember and have greater impact than general discussion points. Often a point you want to make is best demonstrated when you give a personal example. It makes your point more relatable.

You can do the Balance Training either as on opening exercise or after your discussion. Depending on the length of your meeting, you may elect to discuss only two ideas and allow 15 minutes for the Balance Training. Nothing is set in stone, you do it the way it feels right for you.

Core	CO	ncept	ot	Bal	lance	Training:
						.

forget to be realistic about what we can accomplish within that amount of time. The Balance Training teaches how to set priorities. Using a calendar with days broken down into time increments makes it easy to see and explain how the needs of all family members are being addressed. The best part is that women can—and should—include their own appointments and self-care needs on the calendar. Make the family a part of the planning helps to gain support and understanding. Enjoy!